

infrastructure. I think the recent additions to the infrastructure are helping, but again, when you look at the projection of the number of inmates into the future, you look at the types of issues that were raised and you look at things like needing medium- and maximum-security beds.

I think that what has happened is that the investment over the last couple of years has slowed the rate of growth of the problem. The problem was growing at a certain rate. By making that investment, the rate of growth of the problem has changed, but the problem is still growing. There still are not all of the maximum- and medium-security beds that are needed. There's going to be the problem of the offender population growing and that sort of thing.

My view of it is that it has just been a problem that has been around for a long time. There have been many studies about it. There have been other reports that have brought the issue forward. There have been some steps taken, but those steps, like I say, I think all they have done is manage to slow the rate of growth of the problem. They haven't been able to reverse that so that the problem isn't growing any more.

Fundamentally, I think, on that side of things in terms of the facilities, like I say, I think it has essentially overwhelmed the department's ability to cope. I think, in terms of some of the administrative things we found in the audit, it's certainly possible for the department to deal with many of those, but the facility issue is a much harder one for them to cope with.

Chairman: Thank you, Mr. Ferguson. Ms. Angnakak.

principally because we are responsible for a group of inmates that are a part of the territory. They are in our custody and that’s a very high responsibility. Personally, it will remain number one in my priority.

Secondly, wearing the legal hat, I am very mindful of our constitutional obligations around taking people into custody. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as you have heard me say before, places a very high standard on government officials. I am very mindful of that as well.

As well, in this territory, Inuit social values that are built into how government is required to operate speak directly to how we deal with these individuals who happen to be in our custody. It’s not just the individuals who are in our custody, but also the staff that work with the individuals. We have to ensure that we are respecting the inmates, the staff, and the public. We have to ensure that we are fostering good spirit, being open, and welcoming. I could go on, but Inuit social values are very much a guiding part of why I came here to Nunavut and how we will carry out that responsibility.

Under my leadership, responding to these recommendations, which we’re very grateful for, will be a priority for me. From there, I can require that from my officials, either formally through performance management, but I have worked with them enough to know that I don’t have to require anything from them formally; they are totally dedicated to addressing these issues.

Moving forward, it’s not just the Department of Justice alone. Some of these issues require your help, as I said in Auditor General’s standpoint but if he has any comments to make on that question I will allow it. Mr. Ferguson.

Mr. Ferguson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. No, we didn’t do an analysis on how much that would cost. Again, that would have to start with the determination of what the exact needs are. Maybe the comment that I will make about this is as an auditor it’s always very easy at the end of an audit to say that the department or the government or whatever should put more money into this problem to resolve this problem.

It’s something we consider very carefully when we are going through our audit process because we don’t want to take the easy way out. We spent a lot of time in the course of this audit trying to figure out what we felt the department could do within the resources that were available to them. It just came down at the end that we couldn’t ignore the fact that, as I think I said earlier on in the afternoon, that in terms of the facility challenges those facilities challenges are just overwhelming the department.

So again, we don’t like to make a recommendation that says the government should be putting more money into something but in this case they have to find a way of dealing with those facility challenges, and we recognize that there is no other way to do that or no way to do that is not going to require there being significant infusion of financial resources. So we didn’t do that estimate, we don’t make those types of comments lightly. We only make those types of recommendations after we have considered what the opportunities are for working within the means that have already been provided. In this case we
